Apostolic Visit

organizations representing heads of women's religious orders in the U.S.

It is too early to know how many volunteers will be enlisted to visit nearly 400 Catholic institutes for women religious in the U.S., how much it will cost or who will pay for the study, Sister Eva-Maria said during the press conference at the national shrine.

"We hope to discover and share the vibrancy and purpose that continue to accomplish so much, as well as to understand the obstacles and challenges that inhibit these individuals and institutions, thus limiting their growth and/or redirecting their resources and outreach," she said.

The study -- which is expected to be completed by 2011 -- is in no way connected to the apostolic visitation of more than 200 U.S. seminaries and formation houses in 2005 and 2006, which was ordered in response to the sexual abuse crisis that hit the U.S. church, Sister Eva-Maria said.

It was not known why the Vatican chose to do this study now, why the U.S. was singled out and what prompted the Vatican congregation to order it, she said. "I don't even want to speculate."

Once the study is concluded, a "comprehensive and confidential" report will be given to Cardinal Rode, but its findings are not expected to be made public, Sister Eva-Maria said.

"First, Mother Clare will solicit voluntary input from the superiors general through inviting them to make personal visits with her in Rome or in the United States," she said. "During the second stage, the major superiors in the United States will be asked for information such as statistics, activities and community practices. Selected on-site visits will be made during the third stage."

Catholic women religious have been involved in education, health care and a variety of pastoral and social services in the U.S. since before the nation was founded in 1776, said Mother Clare in a prepared statement released at the press conference.

"I am truly humbled and a bit overwhelmed," she said of her assignment. "While I have visited each of the communities and missions in my own congregation, the thought of gathering facts and findings about nearly 400 institutes across the United States can be daunting in scope." A Web site, www.apostolicvisitation.org, has been launched to provide basic information about the project.

"I know that the object of this visitation is to encourage and strengthen apostolic communities of women religious, for the simple reason that these communities are integral to the entire life of the Catholic Church, in the United States and beyond," Mother Clare said.

Sister Eva-Maria acknowledged that the population of women religious has significantly dropped during the past several decades, and that fewer nuns have chosen to teach school in the past 30 years in favor of doing social outreach.

"Recruitment is of great concern for every (religious) community," she said.

"We live in a very different society," she added, than that experienced by many of the U.S. saints who were nuns -- Sts. Elizabeth Ann Seton, Frances Xavier Cabrini, Katharine Drexel, Rose Philippine Duchesne and Mother Theodore Guerin.

RI's women religious prepared for visit

PROVIDENCE -- Sister Jacqueline Dickey, SSCh, the director of the diocesan Office for Religious said that she was surprised that the country's women religious were being singled out by the visitation, but said she was confident that the apostolic visitor would find active, committed religious women across the country.

"I realize that this decline is also being felt by the religious orders of men and by the priests, even the diocesan priests, and also by religious orders in many other countries in the western world," she said.

"On the other hand, we are going to be happy to cooperate with [the apostolic visitor]. We may have diminished in numbers, but we're still active in the Church."

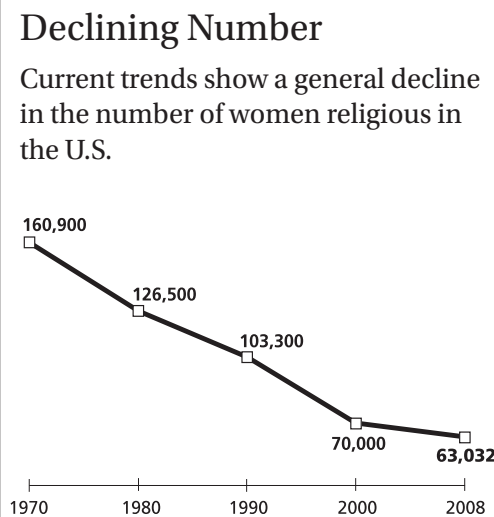

She added that a visitor would find "religious that are very much committed to their religious life, and to the apostolic life and to servicing the poor."

Sr. Dickey estimated that the diocese has experienced about a 30 percent drop in the number of vocations to women's religious orders during her 12-year tenure in the Office for Religious. She added that that drop was most likely consistent with dioceses across the country. But despite declining numbers, commitment to the lifestyle has not declined, she asserted.

"It sometimes appears to that on the surface ... people see religious now in lay clothes or out in restaurants, but these are superficial things... they are committed to their prayer life."

About 40 women's religious orders are represented in the diocese, although some by only one or two religious sisters.
